Hugh Everett on Why Injury Claims Are Decided Long Before Trial

Toronto lawyer Hugh Everett explains how his injury litigation practice builds damages claims from the first client meeting, not the weeks before trial.

Toronto, Ontario Nov 26, 2026 (Issuewire.com) - Hugh Everett is a Toronto lawyer whose practice covers criminal defence, civil disputes, and injury litigation. Within that injury practice, he draws a distinction that he says gets missed: liability is only one part of a claim. Damages are the harder, longer part of the work.

"Liability is one dimension," Everett says. "Damages require deep analysis. Future care costs, income loss, and non-pecuniary loss must be grounded in a defensible methodology."

That methodology, he says, is not something a lawyer can assemble quickly once a case nears trial. It has to be built over time, with evidence that holds up to scrutiny from an insurer or opposing counsel.

What Gets Measured, and Why It Takes Time

When a client comes to him after a serious injury, Everett treats the file as a long-term project from day one.

"Someone has been injured," he says. "They need solutions. Assessing their future care, earning capacity, and life planning must be approached comprehensively. The record must be built deliberately over time."

That record includes medical evidence, expert input on future care needs, and a realistic picture of how an injury affects a person's ability to earn a living. Everett says the goal is a claim that can be explained clearly and defended line by line, not one that depends on sympathy alone.

He draws a line between serious and moderate injury cases. Both require discipline, he says, but the time horizon differs.

"Moderate injury cases still require discipline," he says, "but the temporal complexity differs."

Coordinating Experts Early

A recurring theme in how Everett describes his injury work is timing. He says early coordination with experts, rather than a late scramble, is what narrows uncertainty in a claim.

"Counterparties respond to organization and credibility," he says. "Early expert coordination and coherent modelling narrow uncertainty. That provides strength in our approach."

That strength, he says, is what eventually moves a case toward resolution, whether through negotiation or trial.

When Causation Is Disputed

Not every injury case turns on how much a client should recover. Some turn on whether the injury was caused the way the client says it was. Everett treats that question with the same preparation he applies to damages.

"By isolating objective evidence and anticipating alternative explanations before they are advanced," he says, describing his approach to contested causation. "Leaving no evidentiary assumption untested. Not being caught by surprise because you have game-planned every conceivable contingency that may arise."

Measuring Outcomes Beyond the Verdict

Everett resists reducing a case to a single win-or-lose outcome. He says success in an injury claim, like in his other practice areas, exists on a continuum tied to how deliberately decisions were made along the way.

"If decisions are made deliberately and aligned with risk appetite, relative to the probabilistic range of outcomes, then we are controlling what is within our capacity to control," he says. "That is the optimal range for decision-making and success."

A Discipline That Predates the Law Degree

Everett traces some of that discipline to habits outside the courtroom. He trains in martial arts and keeps a regular exercise routine, both of which he has described as a way of testing preparation under pressure before it ever gets tested in a case.

That same instinct, built over years rather than weeks, is what he says separates a damages claim that holds up from one that does not.
