"Every students wants to do something creative, something out of the box and not be restricted by books alone," says Shivam.

What sets apart Avisionindia Events is that they don't charge performers for stage time. "Students themselves are often living on a tight budget, we don't want to make money by charging them," explains SHUBHAM. Their aim is organizing more events so that more talent is encouraged. "We are not a start-up, we are not doing this for revenues. We want to build a brand for ourselves," says the 19-year-old Satyam, who seems to have the gift of the gab. The way he strikes a deal with bigger groups is by telling them that if one needs to reach out to the masses, they need to collaborate with small event management companies, after all, no one was born large. "I also tell them that since we are students, we can connect them to other students who might want to invite them for college fests," he explains. He even gets cafés to give them venues by promising that at least a few participants will buy food These and many other tips Avisionindia and their team members store safely in their bag of tricks.
