This will include addressing a variety of issues related to gum inflammation, gum disease, plaque and tartar build-up, infections in the gums and roots of teeth, and tooth loss requiring implants. In addition to treating and healing these issues, a periodontist will also offer long-term solutions such as installing dental implants or other similar restorative services. Some periodontal issues can be handled by a general dentist. However, more advanced issues coupled with patients who are dealing with the effects of aging, or who have other risk factors such as smoking and diabetes, or those who take certain medications, are best treated by a periodontist. Complex cases are best treated by a periodontal specialist.
