

Former Marine Advocates Collaborative Model for Schools

Debut book outlines methods of handling the 21st century classroom

Tucson, Mar 18, 2019 (IssueWire.com) - Retired Marine and college instructor, Don Broadwell, offers a blueprint for better classroom management and teacher-student interaction in his debut book, "Collaborative Leadership for Classroom and School."

The book is a reaction to Paul Hersey and Ken Blanchard's traditional model of Situational Leadership which the author believes has become obsolete in many of today's classrooms. Information is the currency of the globalized economy and teachers are saddled with the daunting challenge of updating their methods to meet its demands.

For the past three decades, Broadwell has been training teachers and advocating for the use of the collaborative method. His vision is for students to be more involved and have bigger stakes in their education. By being more inclusive, he hopes that they become more independent and self-assured to face a highly competitive world.

Jack Magnus, a reviewer for the website, Readers' Favorite, highly recommends the book. He says that Broadwell was able to address many issues that plague the American education system. Magnus adds that he wished he had known of the book earlier so he could apply the techniques of collaborative leadership to his management style.

Authors Press showcased “Collaborative Leadership for Classroom and School” at the Tucson Festival of Books at the University of Arizona campus last March 2 to 3, 2019. Readers and festival goers got an exclusive preview of Broadwell’s work and advocacy during the festivities.
