There are so many things to think about when running a business. Often training staff and retaining them is the most difficult to do. There are so many different factors to consider when hiring your newest team member. The person you meet in the interview room may not necessarily be the person you think they are when they start in the office. Additionally, many new employees display a dramatic shift in work ethic once the probation period has ended.

Sometimes you need to hire a person for something you do not understand where trends seem to change every 5 minutes, such as digital marketing. You must trust that that person is doing the best for your start-up company. Frequently startups have a limited budget when they are trying to get off the ground to hire the right expertise. It always is a risk-taking on new employees because once a person is hired it doesn't mean they will be the right fit in a year's time.

Once you have finally found the perfect hard-working employee that completes your team, now you need to worry about retention. Training employees can be a huge cost of money and resources. This is not considering the gaps in an organization created while you are training your new employee that can cost revenue and put additional load on the rest of the team distracting them from their main tasks. If you lose an employee that is core to your business this can have huge repercussions.

At Easy Admin we offer start-up companies experienced admin / back-office staff that they can trust but don't have to be tied into any contracts. We wanted to be able to give businesses the flexibility to choose how many hours they needed because some businesses only need a couple of hours a week to assist with a few specific tasks such as invoicing or customer follow up. Others need a few hours of help but in different aspects of business like social media, content writing, and diary management. Using Easy Admin's services, you can even help over business environments that are facing large seasonal peak or slowdowns by having administrative support only for the hours you need it when you need it.
