Most people think that being an entrepreneur is about having that big idea. And it is. To start something new, you need to have an idea that works: something people need, something they'll want, and most importantly — at least for the people investing in your idea — something that's scalable.

But what I've found from interviewing multiple entrepreneurs who focus on consulting, the internet, and software development is that without the capacity to execute an idea — to take an idea and turn it into a living, breathing, viable organization — you're doomed to fail. And for many entrepreneurs who are thinkers, rather than doers, this is a frightening notion
