Internal medicine is a field of practice focused on treating adults. Doctors prevent, diagnose, and treat diseases that afflict all adults, from chronically ill patients, to short-term care. Once a doctor completes an internal medicine residency, they are subsequently referred to as an internist. Internists typically choose to subspecialize on one illness or one part of the body. For example, a cardiologist concentrates their focus on heart-related issues, while an endocrinologist deals with hormonal issues related to glands. An internist's specific medical training enables them to provide precise medical guidance, which is necessary for both disease prevention and routine care. Depending on a patient's medical condition, they may be required to see separate internists, which can be costly and time-consuming. However, the specific, focused care of all internists is something that should not be ignored by patients.

After earning their bachelor's degree, internists go to medical school for four years, then enter into a residency program that typically lasts three years. During their residency, the internists get their medical license and become board certified in internal medicine. If the internist chooses to subspecialize, each specialization requires one to four years of additional training, depending on the subspecialty. During their academic studies and hands-on residencies, internists are tasked with solving difficult medical problems, thereby training them to deal with most any medical issues, especially ones they subspecialize in.
