Tide Empty Nesters over the Pandemic

The World Trade United Foundation has launched an aid campaign to help the elderly and disadvantaged group in Wuhan. The elderly people are especially vulnerable and susceptible to the virus. Most of them don't know how to use a mobile phone and shop online; some of them even don't have a mobile phone; shutdown of groceries and quarantine measures have made it very difficult to live.

The aid campaign focuses on providing living supplies for empty nesters and poor elders. The first batch of supplies is already given out to the needed by Lianhe Community; the supplies were 20 types of daily necessities including disinfectants, grains, cooking oil, egg, meat and other, totaling one ton in weight. The World Trade United Foundation will carry on with the aid efforts until the end of community shutdown.

The Foundation will also focus on the more extensive impact of the pandemic on them by figuring out ways to ensure the disadvantaged will continue to have access to social security and health services as well as necessary mental support.

Rise Above Discrimination and Tide Over the Crisis as a Global Community of Common Future

Dato' Sri Prof. Ng, Tat-Yung, founder of the World Trade United Foundation said that there are still tens of thousands of infected patients under treatment worldwide. Those who work on the frontline and disadvantaged groups still need supplies. The Foundation hopes to eliminate the demand-and-supply gap to support pandemic relief efforts through donating the most needed personal protective items, medical devices and daily necessities. It is also working closely with several international organizations in educating the public about how to protect personal health and safety. Meanwhile, the Foundation and the Beijing Zhongan Charitable Foundation have jointly launched “Bring Warmth to Medical Workers” in an effort to provide psychological support for those who fight on the frontline.
