

A Superhero that Educates about Racism

Los Angeles, Jun 6, 2020 (Issuewire.com) - A superhero in the making by creator Eric Protein Moseley could help educate the public about racism and bridge the gap in diversity by way of an ebook which is available on Amazon.

The ebook known as Captain Negro (the making of a superhero) illustrates just how diversity and racism began at The Tower of Babel from the anger of God because of man trying to enter his kingdom without his consent.

The ebook is introducing how Captain Negro will hopefully become a physical representation of peace among the police and the African-American community and to someday be turned into a motion picture which has already been registered at The Writers Guild of America West.

According to The Tower of Babel, racism didn't exist until the almighty appeared on earth and confounded his people for attempting to invite themselves into heaven without his permission.

Since then, history has constantly repeated itself when it comes to racial disparities against people of color and police departments without a mediator to join the two groups together.

Understanding the problem first, is always the best approach in coming up with a solution and when it comes to racism-many people don't understand why it exists in the first place is why Captain Negro (the making of a superhero) would be a valuable tool during these troubling times.

<https://www.amazon.com/Captain-Negro-Making-Super-Hero-ebook/dp/B07Y18Z8LK>

<https://poddtoppen.se/podcast/1500992005/craigslis-conversations/eric-protein-moseley-inspiring-former-homeless-addict-turned-advocate-ep-4>

Media Contact

Twin City Publishing

businessstree@outlook.com

2138409289

Source : Twin City Publishing

See on IssueWire