With a long pandemic ruling our lives for almost two years now, people have been immensely impacted. So, globally, people started going impulsive and doing things they might not have considered doing before. Although tattoo parlors were closed for many months owing to the global outbreak of the virus, they are also seeing a surge in demand. It is expected that the tattoo industry which stands at $1.4 billion will increase its size in the market by 23.2% in 2021 alone. It exhibits that people have started taking more impulsive decisions following the pandemic. Since piercings and tattoos are something permanent, there has always been an underlined taboo in society. But with the current exponential resurgence, these inhibitions are slowly lowering.

The ongoing success seen in the tattoo industry surpasses many other consumer-driven industries including restaurants or theatres. There are many significant and popular media outlets that have statistically shown the increase in tattoo enthusiasts following the lockdown. It is not just restricted to a certain region but is a global surge. Psychologically and based on modern culture, it could be a result of the collective 'YOLO mentality' that says 'You Only Live Once'. There is instant gratification in getting a tattoo and could be one of the main reasons behind it. After a harrowing mental trauma, people find themselves feeling good to do something for themselves. Since other sources of entertainment were closed, many tattoo shops continued with their operations.
