Furthermore, it has experienced and well-equipped doctors who stay updated with the latest technology and types of equipment used for the modern methods of hair restoration surgery.

The methods that are followed here for hair restoration are mentioned above. Still, the most preferred procedure for hair transplants here is FUE (Follicular Unit Extraction), in which surgeons transplant grafts into bald areas of patients after collecting them from the donor region. This process requires precision because doctors must collect tiny follicular units with microscopic devices. Panacea has an expert team who ensures that the patient doesn't catch any infections during and after the operation. People choose FUE because it does not require any tearing of skin as well as no stitches. Skilled surgeons at Panacea make a timeline and then work according to it to minimize the side effects. The patient is given local anesthesia to stop the sensation of pain completely before the surgery takes place.

Thousands of small incisions are made in the area with healthy hair during FUE hair transplants. Surgeons mark these incisions in the donor area to accumulate and preserve carefully selected follicular units. These are gently extracted one at a time for implantation into the balding target volume of the scalp. Because FUE is a more complex and time-consuming procedure than other hair restoration methods, it requires a more skilled surgeon. An extraction tool is often a hand-held, manually operated pen-shaped instrument.
