A variety of jewellery was used by Native Americans, but the bone choker is still one of the most famous pieces of jewellery today. It is common for these chokers to be made from bone and glass beads, and many of them are still handcrafted in the original Native American fashion in which they were first created. A beautiful and meaningful work of art is completed when their beads are strung together with leather to create a stunning piece of jewellery.

It is believed that these breastplates or chokers were developed hundreds of years ago for Native American tribes to wear during times of warfare. The purpose was to protect their neck and jugular veins while engaged in combat. According to their belief, if they wore these decorations, they could deflect any arrow that might be aimed at them by their adversaries. It is common for chokers to be reasonably comprehensive and cover around half the neck area. Traditionally, Native American chokers are made with animal bones and beads. Both ends have holes and each measure approximately half an inch. These embellishments can be attached with shells or medallions, and they come in a variety of colours.

Native American bone chokers used to be considered a necessity in Native American culture, but nowadays, they are considered a fashion statement, and young people all over the world are wearing these chokers as jewellery.

The Choker is made from Native American bone and has a beautiful design. A Native American Bone Choker is a stunning piece of jewellery that has a fascinating backstory behind it.

A significant art form that is appreciated throughout many cultures around the globe is Native American jewellery, a beautiful, diverse, and meaningful art form. Handmade items are revered as artefacts from the American Indian civilisation, and the emergence of wholesale jewellery manufacture has resulted in their incorporation into contemporary fashion and style as a result.

A bone choker is one of the most distinctive and traditional accessories among Native Americans. Now they are manufactured, developed, and widely distributed as everyday items, marketed to the general public as a result of their high market penetration. Native American chokers, on the other hand, had a much more meaningful purpose in tradition.

It is no secret that American Indians used animal bones as the basis for the construction of bone chokers. Birds, buffaloes, and deer made up the bulk of the choker material, with bird legs being particularly well suited for the production of chokers due to their length and shape. There was usually no intent to slaughter the animal for the purpose of making jewellery, but rather the remnants of the animal were used to make jewellery after it died of natural causes or as a victim of predators.
