The term "pathology" specifically is studying the pathogenic process. Pathogenesis refers to any illness and logy is the word used to study it, which is why it can be a pathology. It is evident from the definition itself that when you undergo a pathological test different parts of your body get tested to determine whether there is any type of disease. The tests are not limited to the investigation of illness but also to the course of its development. The doctor will use the outcomes of your pathological tests to determine the treatment plan for you in the future. The tests for pathology are typically conducted on different organs and fluids such as urine, blood, feces, and sputum. A pathologist is able to examine urine, blood, or feces to find an explanation for the condition that the patient may be suffering from. There are an endless number of tests for pathology. It is obvious that without an accurate diagnosis, successful treatment is not possible and testing for pathology is the first step towards achieving the same.
