What is General Liability Insurance?

General liability insurance protects businesses from lawsuits that may arise due to their negligence. This type of insurance is often required by law, and businesses that are not insured may find themselves at a disadvantage in court.

There are several factors to consider when purchasing general liability insurance for your business. These include the level of coverage you need, the deductible you're willing to pay, and the premium cost.

Some of the most common types of coverage included in general liability policies include:

-Property damage: This coverage pays for damages caused to physical property owned by your client, like breaking a client window while working at their house.

-Bodily injury: This coverage covers injuries to people who are associated with the business in some way, such as employees or customers. This can also be customer slip and falls.

-Business interruption: This coverage helps prevent businesses from being forced out of operation due to a sudden accident or lawsuit. It usually covers lost revenue and costs associated with replacing equipment or shutting down temporarily.

What is the Purpose of General Liability Insurance?

General liability insurance protects businesses from lawsuits that may arise as a result of someone's negligence or intentional actions. This type of insurance covers costs associated with legal proceedings, such as damages, court costs, and attorney fees. In some cases, general liability insurance can also cover economic losses, such as lost profits or diminished goodwill.

Businesses in California should consider acquiring general liability insurance to protect themselves from potential legal issues. General liability policies typically have premiums that are based on the size and risk of the business. Businesses in high-risk industries, such as construction and manufacturing, may need to pay higher premiums for coverage.

General liability insurance is important for businesses because it can help prevent costly litigation. If a lawsuit does occur, general liability insurance can help cover costs associated with the suit, such as attorneys' fees and court costs. Without this type of coverage, businesses could be forced into bankruptcy or settle for less than they're worth due to a financial setback caused by a lawsuit.
