Newborns are tested for hearing using the BERA test. Hearing testing after 1 month of age, diagnosis after 3 months of age and access to early intervention services before 6 months of age.

Without these important steps, early identification may not be possible and the child may fall behind in communication, reading, or social-emotional development, which may reduce academic or employment achievement later in life. A recent study published in Pediatrics found that deaf and hard of hearing children enrolled in diagnosis and intervention according to the 1-3-6 guidelines had better vocabulary than children who did not receive these services in a timely manner. More than 40% of children included in the study did not receive diagnostic and intervention services at recommended intervals to keep their language development on track.
