Homeowners planning to upgrade their kitchen must make innumerable decisions about how they want their space to look after the renovation. Curtis Ray Pepper recommends starting with the spacing for the pathways based on the number of people expected to use the kitchen. The height placement of the microwave can be set based on whether children in the household are expected to use the kitchen along with their parents.

Several smaller design considerations can also boost productivity. Cleaning time can be cut significantly by using under-mount sinks or flush sets or choosing matte surfaces that do not show as much dirt as glossy ones. Planning a kitchen island to reside in a central location can help streamline the entire time that one spends cooking. Having countertops at different heights can allow the kids to work alongside their parents.

“You have to settle on a language that flawlessly fits into the rest of the home’s décor,” says Curtis Ray Pepper. “It is recommended to use softer shades in the kitchen as they make it feel more spacious and appealing. Choosing a focal point and building the rest of the kitchen around it will help you solidify the broader design. Avoid fancy flooring, sizable range hoods, splashy tiles, bright and disturbing kitchen cabinets, and busy countertop patterns as you want to be focused while you are in there. There is just so much to learn and test with. If you feel overwhelmed, do not worry as you can always depend on experts to help you through the whole process.
