Bengaluru, Karnataka Mar 10, 2024 (Issuewire.com) - A set of transparent, detachable plastic aligners is used in a type of orthodontic treatment called "clear aligners" to straighten teeth. They offer several benefits over wired braces and are a substitute for traditional metal braces. If patients would rather maintain privacy throughout treatment, they can straighten their teeth without anybody knowing because clear aligners are almost invisible when worn. Because there are no brackets or wires within the mouth like with braces, they are also more comfortable. It is simpler for patients to maintain oral hygiene when they take their aligners to eat, brush, and floss.

Clear aligner treatment typically entails wearing a new set of aligners for roughly two weeks every four to six months. Each patient's teeth are gradually moved into the intended ultimate position by the aligners, which are created specifically for them. A sequence of aligners that gradually move teeth is made using computer imaging and 3D printing technologies. Every six to eight weeks, patients visit their orthodontist for progress evaluations and aligner adjustments.

Patients at Puranik's Dental Care first receive a thorough examination and dental impressions before starting clear aligner therapy. A thorough treatment plan is developed using a 3D scan of the patient's existing bite. The movement of the teeth during treatment is shown in this plan. The patient reviews it with you so they are aware of the anticipated outcomes. Treatment starts as soon as the plan is approved and a series of clear aligners are made.

Minor to moderate tooth alignment problems, such as fixing gaps, adjusting overbites or underbites, and rotating teeth, can all be resolved using clear aligners. According to Dr. Puranik, they function by steadily and gently pressing the teeth into their proper locations. They went on, "More people believe that transparent aligners are only good for minor modifications, yet in most situations, they can straighten teeth just as effectively as braces. Thanks to significant technological advancements, a wide range of orthodontic issues can now be treated with transparent aligners.

Clear aligners function by applying consistent, mild force to the teeth, as opposed to traditional braces that employ wires and brackets that are attached directly to the teeth. Gradually exerting pressure, each aligner is a little bit tighter than the last, shifting teeth little by little. The teeth and tissues that support them will benefit more from this gentle movement. It produces more stable outcomes by giving the gums, bones, and ligaments time to adjust to their new placements.

Compared to fixed braces, dental hygiene is also simpler with transparent aligners because they are detachable. While their aligners are out, patients can continue to brush and floss as usual, which can help avoid cavities, gum disease, and foul breath. While wires can trap food particles, aligners don't. Regular dental cleanings are still necessary. During therapy, this decreased plaque accumulation results in improved oral health overall.
