Over the course of his impressive career, spanning 25 years as a certified school psychologist, he has contributed significantly to the well-being and development of individuals across the age spectrum. His diverse background encompasses a range of settings, from the challenging environment of a Maximum-Security Unit in the Connecticut Department of Correction to the more conventional spaces of public and private schools at elementary, middle, high school, and college levels.

Beyond conventional psychological concerns, he has successfully addressed a wide range of clinical challenges faced by children, adolescents, and their parents. These challenges include learning and executive function issues, sexual orientation and gender identity struggles, depression, anxiety, ADHD, school refusal, and various disruptive behavioral and emotional disorders. Through comprehensive neuropsychological assessments, he seeks to provide a holistic understanding of each individual's unique profile and its impact on learning and daily life.

Neuropsychology focuses on identifying the neuro-anatomical sources in the brain of cognitive, emotional, or behavioral function. As such, it can identify the course of change in function that follows a neurological trauma or condition. A neuropsychologist would generally seek natural and non-invasive ways to foster recovery and improvement, or even peak performance, in those who are struggling with effects on their performance.
