	AARON AMBRIT AUTHOR OF WHISPERS IN THE WOODS As she made her way to the kitchen, Elizabeth found Samuel already awake, brewing a pot of strong, black coffee. The aroma filled the air, intertwining with the crisp scent of the surrounding forest. She approached cautiously, unsure of how to initiate a conversation with this enigmatic stranger. "Thank you for the coffee, Samuel," she said, breaking the silence. "You mentioned being lost in these woods. How did you end up here?" Samuel's gaze drifted momentarily to the window, his eyes reflecting a distant memory. "I've been traveling for as long as I can remember, ma'am," he replied, his voice tinged with a hint of melancholy. "Sometimes, the path we choose leads us to places we never intended to go. These woods... they have a way of swallowing you whole, bending your perception of time and reality."	▲ The stranger nodded, his eyes gleaming with gratitude, though still partially hidden by the shadow cast by his hat. "Thank you, ma'am. I swear upon my life, you won't regret this act of kindness." Elizabeth led the mysterious man into the cabin's dimly lit living room. The dancing flames in the fireplace provided a minimal source of warmth, casting an eerie glow that seemed to accentuate the lines on his weathered face. Introductions were made, albeit with a lingering air of uncertainty. Elizabeth learned that the stranger's name was Samuel Blackwood, a traveller who had lost his way in the depths of the surrounding forest. His clothes were torn and muddled, bearing witness to the hardships he had endured.	Every shadow seemed to twist and contort, every creak of the wooden floors sounding like a menacing whisper. She paused, her breath catching in her throat as she felt unseen eyes boring into her back, a cold shiver running down her spine. Upon reaching the living room, Elizabeth froze in terror. The windows were all sealed shut, the door barricaded from the inside. Panic clawed at her insides, a sense of impending doom tightening its grip on her racing heart. Her mind screamed for Jacob, for safety, but he was nowhere to be found in his room. Frantic, she searched the cabin, her steps quickening with each passing moment. And then, a gut-wrenching sight stopped her dead in her tracks.
