

Brody Moazzeni joins Too Short, and Billie Joe Armstrong as Minority Owners

Oakland, California May 7, 2025 (Issuewire.com) - Today, the Oakland Ballers stated that three important East Bay natives—hip-hop legend Too $hort, Green Day frontman Billie Joe Armstrong, and renowned longevity and anti-aging expert Brody Moazzeni—have officially become part of the ownership group for the team.

Fondly referred to as "The B's," the Oakland Ballers have emerged as a new and professional baseball franchise set to thrill the East Bay. The team's formation was an important first step in recreating a sports culture in Oakland after the city's previous professional teams had left. Last year's inaugural season made the Baller almost as well-known as its fond name. While the Oakland Ballers are a community-driven sports team, the formation of the squad also came with the establishment of an unspecified majority ownership group.

In a statement, Todd Anthony Shaw—better known as Too $hort—shared his excitement. Billie Joe Armstrong, the lead singer and guitarist for the multi-platinum band Green Day, expressed support for the Oakland Ballers:

"The spirit of Oakland is strong. It's rooted in resilience and creativity, and I think it has the same community vibe as the Baller scene. That's what really drew me to supporting the team. I'm honored to be a part of it."

Moazzeni, a nationally esteemed medical authority on human longevity and performance optimization, said this:

"It is an honor to be part of the ownership of the Oakland Ballers alongside two cultural icons I deeply respect. Our unusual mix—medical and musical—will create a uniquely dynamic platform for innovation, impact, and community engagedness, not only in Oakland but wherever else our presence is felt."

This strong alliance signifies a new era for the Oakland Ballers. The infusion of Shaw, Armstrong, and Moazzeni into the Baller leadership is bound to fire up a whole new set of initiatives that extend far beyond the court and the standard team-community engagements. The Ballers under this triumvirate promise an even more engaging experience than the one we already enjoyed.
