Multimedia creative and young visionary Prap Young continues redefining what it means to be an independent force in tech and entertainment. This summer, he launched a full version of Fusion Mobile — a web-based video and calling platform that requires no app store, no Google sign-in, and no gatekeepers. The same month, he brought back his original energy drink, Rush Hour, first created in 2022 and now reborn as a grassroots cultural symbol.

But that's not all. After being personally invited by YouTuber Muaaz, Prap Young submitted a 5-second video to represent Team Water, a viral charity campaign connected to MrBeast, the most subscribed YouTuber in the world. Whether his face makes it into the final Team Water cut or not, his impact is undeniable: he's become a name to watch.

Prap Young's story blends heartache with hustle—he's faced grief, loss, and countless obstacles over the last two years, but never stopped building. From launching a weather site to creating a personalized search engine, from writing a slasher book series (Phantom Requiem) to uplifting his 5-year-old nephew into a Netflix opportunity, every move he makes is intentional.
