“Many people don’t realize that just because you’ve previously secured relief, it doesn’t mean your case is permanently closed,” said Attorney Uzo J. Mokolo, founder of Mokolo Law Firm. “We’re seeing a sharp increase in cases being recalendared — often without warning. When that happens, you need to act immediately.”

Mokolo Law Firm has outlined several legal strategies for individuals facing reinstated removal proceedings, including:

- Motions to Reopen or Reconsider due to legal or procedural errors
- Applications for Cancellation of Removal based on changed personal or family circumstances
- Reapplications for Asylum or Withholding of Removal, particularly when country conditions have deteriorated
- Adjustment of Status, especially for those who now qualify through marriage or family-based petitions

The firm also emphasizes the importance of updated documentation and evidence, such as proof of U.S. family ties, community contributions, medical issues, or country-specific dangers.

Clients facing renewed deportation risk often feel caught off guard, but Mokolo Law Firm has made it clear: there are still options, and the right legal team can make the difference between staying or being removed.

“Our team builds each case from the ground up — examining the facts, preparing evidence, and ensuring every motion is timely and grounded in current law,” said Attorney Uzo. “The stakes are high, and every detail matters.”
