Innovative tokenized agreements designed to offset stagnant wages, reduced benefits, and weak savings returns

CapitalTech today announced the introduction of Revenue-Sharing Tokens (RSTs), a new asset class that provides households with direct access to company revenues as a source of stable income.

With automation accelerating, households face a “triple squeeze”: stagnant wages, shrinking government support, and historically low returns from savings and bonds. CapitalTech’s RSTs are designed to counter this pressure by linking household income directly to the growth of businesses in high-output sectors.

“Revenue-Sharing Tokens bridge the gap between technological growth and household income stability,” said Kyle Meyer, Founder of CapitalTech. “They allow accredited investors to participate in company revenues in a way that traditional savings or government programs cannot.”

A New Household Income Tool

RSTs are created by tokenizing Revenue-Sharing Agreements (RSAs), which distribute a percentage of gross revenues directly to investors. Benefits include:

- Quarterly cash flow as revenues are earned.
- Inflation protection through CPI-linked features.
- Liquidity and accessibility via blockchain and secondary trading.

Building Diversified Portfolios

CapitalTech is structuring portfolios of RSAs across automation-driven industries, including construction, data centers, hospitality, housing, gaming, energy, and advanced manufacturing. Investments are offered through tokenized SPVs under Reg D 506(c) and Reg S, with secondary trading available on compliant Alternative Trading Systems (ATS).
