Miami, Florida Apr 27, 2026 (IssueWire.com) - Andrew Tate was spotted in Miami recently, attending a UFC event as part of a packed crowd for one of the sport's biggest nights and now linked to a potential appearance at the high profile UFC event expected to take place at the White House in June, with speculation growing around who could be in attendance.

The former kickboxing champion, known for his 'larger than life' personality, has appeared relaxed during his time in the states. While no official guest list has been confirmed for the White House event, Tate's name has begun circulating online alongside a number of other sporting public figures, igniting discussion and debate across social media.

The influencer, who has remained a visible presence at major events in recent months, was asked about the rumours and appeared to play them down.

Andrew Tate said:

"I've seen the same rumours as everyone else. Maybe, maybe not, we'll see. Maybe I'll pop in"

Tate, who has built a global following of over 10 Million Followers on X and continues to attract attention both online and offline, has regularly appeared at high profile sporting events, particularly within the UFC/Fighting world.

His potential attendance at a White House hosted event would mark a significant moment and likely create controversy, further fuelling discussion around his ongoing public presence.

Despite online rumours, there has been no official confirmation regarding his attendance, and those close to the situation have stayed quiet. However, the rumours have been enough to spark interest, with many noting that Tate's name continues to surface in unexpected places.

For now, Tate appears relaxed about the speculation, offering little more than a brief response and leaving the rest open to interpretation.

"If I'm there, I'm there," he added. "If not, life goes on."
