

James Sackl Launches Golden Age, a Long-Form Writing Project on Building in the Most Resourced Era

Melbourne-based founder of Wallace Biotechnologies and Terraform Technologies opens a public archive of essays on thinking, execution and resilience — written for the generation inheriting the most capable moment in history.

Melbourne, Victoria May 25, 2026 (IssueWire.com) - Australian founder and writer James Sackl has launched jamessackl.com.au, a long-form publishing project gathering his essays on building companies, thinking under pressure and using the leverage available to anyone now. The site goes live with 27 essays already published, organised under the banner he calls the Golden Age.

The Golden Age is not a forecast. It is a description of the present. As Sackl writes in the opening essay, the tools available to any individual today, access to all human knowledge, global communication, computational leverage, capital markets, and distribution at zero marginal cost, represent an accumulation of civilisational progress that previous generations could not have imagined. The age is golden. The experience of it, for most people, is not.

The site exists to address that gap.

"Most people are not experiencing this as a golden age. They are experiencing it as anxiety, overwhelm, uncertainty and comparison," Sackl says. "The same connectivity that makes the Golden Age possible is also the mechanism that delivers a continuous feed of crisis and inadequacy. The frameworks that produce results, for thinking, for execution, for investing, are not widely taught. That is what the writing is for. Not inspiration, which is temporary. Tools, which are permanent."

Two companies, one thesis

Sackl writes as a working founder, not a commentator. He is currently building Wallace Biotechnologies, a Singapore-domiciled biotech company developing technologies to enhance human health span and the health of the environment, and Terraform Technologies, an energy and resources infrastructure company harnessing fusion energy, primarily the sun, to produce cheap resources at scale. Both companies were architected on the same conviction that the Golden Age project is built on: biology and energy are the two substrates that constrain everything else, and the engineering answers exist.

What the essays cover

The published archive spans vision, execution and personal practice. Recurring themes include asymmetric bets, capping the downside, uncapping the upside, and looking at magnitude rather than probability; leverage in its three modern forms of code, media and capital; selling first and building second as the only honest test of market signal; and resilience as recovery rate rather than toughness.

Other essays draw directly from Sackl's own track record across software, training, agriculture, migration and consumer products. He founded his first company at twenty-one, walking the streets of Melbourne selling advertising space on a website that did not yet exist, collecting payment upfront and then building the site. He later designed an all-in-one rapid antigen test pen that generated 130 million dollars in sales during the COVID-19 pandemic. He has also written publicly about a later period in which the earlier companies he built were dismantled by external shock. The lesson he extracted, structural resilience, now sits at the core of how both Wallace and Terraform are constructed.

Built for the generation entering adulthood now

The intended audience is direct. Sackl writes that the project is particularly urgent for young people inheriting unprecedented leverage alongside unprecedented noise, comparison and a deficit of practical guidance. The education system has not caught up with the world. Most mentorship is not available at scale.

"The Golden Age is not waiting for you on the other side of your problems," Sackl says. "It is available to you now, from wherever you are. The question is whether you are going to use it."

The full archive is available at jamessackl.com.au/essays. Readers can subscribe to receive new essays as they are published.

About James Sackl

James Sackl is an Australian founder and writer based in Melbourne. He is the founder of Wallace Biotechnologies and Terraform Technologies, both Singapore-domiciled, and the author of the Golden Age essay collection at jamessackl.com.au. He writes about building companies, decision-making, leverage and the practical use of the present moment

Media Contact

James Sackl

*****@jamessackl.com.au

<http://jamessackl.com.au>

Source : James Sackl

See on IssueWire