

Koichi Yamada Announces Educational Support Foundation Initiative for Japanese Families

Former international business leader aims to empower parents and support children's futures through sustainable educational initiatives and community-driven assistance.

Kamogawa, Chiba Jun 8, 2026 (Issuewire.com) - Koichi Yamada, a former international business executive with decades of experience in global business, has announced plans to establish an educational support foundation dedicated to helping families overcome the growing challenges associated with raising children in Japan.

After retiring from an active career overseas, Yamada initially sought a quiet life upon returning to Japan. However, his growing concern for family welfare and his desire to contribute positively to society led him to create community activities and events designed to help parents and children build meaningful experiences together.

Through his engagement with numerous families, Yamada recognized that recreational activities alone could not adequately address deeper structural issues, including financial pressures and rising childcare-related costs. These observations inspired him to explore more sustainable and impactful solutions.

A turning point came when Yamada met a mother struggling with significant life constraints and feelings of helplessness. Respecting her dignity and preference for independence, both parties established a cooperative relationship built on privacy, transparency, and mutual trust.

Drawing upon his international business expertise, Yamada facilitated access to an innovative digital business system designed with strong security and user-controlled management features. Within this framework, parents maintain direct control over access and security protocols, ensuring transparency and personal autonomy.

Serving as a technical advisor, Yamada provided remote support involving data management and system parameters. The collaboration produced significant positive results within a short period, demonstrating new possibilities for empowering families while preserving their independence.

The mother, deeply impressed by the initiative, repeatedly encouraged Yamada to share his work publicly and engage with media outlets so that more families could benefit from similar opportunities.

“Rather than simply giving someone a fish, it is important to teach them how to fish,” said Yamada. “When families gain the ability to improve their own circumstances, we can truly protect and support the future of children.”

Motivated by the sincere aspirations of parents, Yamada intends to work with more families and partners in the future through the establishment of the educational support foundation, helping create stronger opportunities and brighter futures for households across Japan.
