Houston, Texas Aug 3, 2026 (Issuewire.com) - Zenith Publishing House, a Houston-based book publishing company, has marked 17 years in business and detailed the scope of services it offers independent authors. The Houston based company has produced more than 1,700 titles and around 750 audiobooks so far, working across ghostwriting, editing, formatting, cover design, marketing, and getting finished books listed on platforms like Amazon.

A lot of the authors who show up at Zenith's door have already tried doing this alone. Maybe they got a chapter into formatting before giving up, or spent a weekend trying to design a cover that didn't look homemade. That's usually where the company picks up the thread.

If you haven't written anything yet, their ghostwriting team will build a full manuscript out of your idea and direction. Got a finished draft instead? It moves through editing and formatting, prepped for both print and digital release. Covers get built by genre, not off a template, and once a book's ready to go, the marketing side handles the social media, press outreach, and author website work that comes after launch. Kids' books get their own lane too, since writing for a six-year-old is nothing like writing a memoir.

Who owns the finished book matters here, and Zenith is upfront about it: the author does, fully, at every stage. Nothing goes out without their sign-off first. That's not a small policy detail. It's aimed directly at the fear a lot of first-time authors carry into this kind of arrangement, that handing your book to someone else means it stops being yours.

Clients range pretty widely, from someone publishing their first and only book to writers already a few titles into a series, plus businesses and public figures who want a book written for them rather than doing it themselves. The work spans fiction, nonfiction, memoir, and children's literature, with audiobooks making up a growing share of it as more people read with their ears instead of their eyes.
